Answer: D,E

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

General guidelines for what an access control list consist of are as follows:

Access control list name (depending on the router it could be numeric or combination of letters and numbers)

A sequence number or term name for each entry

A statement of permission or denial for that entry

A network protocol and associated function or ports

- Examples include IP, IPX, ICMP, TCP, UDP, NETBIOS and many others

Destination and Source targets

- These are typically addresses and can be defined as a single discrete address, a range or subnet, or all addresses

Additional flags or identifiers

These additional statements request additional functions when a match is found for the statement.

These flags vary for each protocol but a common flag added to statements is the log feature that records any match to the statement into the router log References:
