NEW QUESTION: 4

The EMP table contains these columns:

You need to display the employees who have not been assigned to any department.

You write the SELECT statement:

SELECT LAST_NAME, SALARY, DEPARTMENT_ID
FROM EMP
WHERE DEPARTMENT_ID = NULL;

What is true about this SQL statement?

- A. The SQL statement displays the desired results.
- B. The WHERE clause should be changed to use an outer join to display the desired results.
- C. The operator in the WHERE clause should be changed to display the desired results.
- D. The column in the WHERE clause should be changed to display the desired results.

Answer: C

Explanation:

The operator in the WHERE clause should be changed to display the desired results. There are times when you want to substitute a value in place of NULL. Oracle provides this functionality with a special function, called NVL(). You cannot use operation equal with NULL, but you can achieve desired results using NVL() function after the WHERE clause.

Incorrect Answers

A: The SQL statement will generate an error because you cannot use operation equal with NULL.

B: The column in the WHERE clause should not be changed to display the desired results.

D: Since there is only one table used in this query you don't need to use outer join to display the desired results.
