An internal development team has migrated away from Waterfall development to use Agile development. Overall, this has been viewed as a successful initiative by the stakeholders as it has improved time-to-market. However, some staff within the security team have contended that Agile development is not secure. Which of the following is the MOST accurate statement?
A. Agile development is more secure than Waterfall as it is a more modern methodology which has the advantage of having been able to incorporate security best practices of recent years.

B. Agile and Waterfall approaches have the same effective level of security posture. They both need similar amounts of security effort at the same phases of development.

C. Agile development has different phases and timings compared to Waterfall. Security activities need to be adapted and performed within relevant Agile phases.

D. Agile development is fundamentally less secure than Waterfall due to the lack of formal up-front design and inability to perform security reviews.

Answer: C

Explanation:

Agile and Waterfall are two distinct methods of software development. The Waterfall model employs a sequential design process. Development flows sequentially from start point to end point, with several different stages. The Agile method is an incremental and iterative approach to software design with the design process being broken into individual models that designers work on. Security activities need to be adapted and performed within individual model that designers work on.
