Answer: C

NEW QUESTION: 3

A customer is using a vSphere APIs for Storage Awareness (VASA) compatible storage array. The VASA provider is published as a virtual appliance.

To ensure recoverability, where must the VASA provider and vCenter server virtual machines be stored?

- A. The VASA provider will be placed on the vVol datastore and the vCenter Server will be placed on the standard datastore (VMFS, NFS)
- B. The vCenter Server will be placed on the vVol datastore and the VASA provider will be placed on the standard datastore (VMFS, NFS).
- C. The VASA provider and vCenter Server will be placed on the standard datastore (VMFS, NFS).
- D. The VASA provider and vCenter Server will be placed on the vVol datastore.

Answer: C

Explanation:

A VASA VM should definitely not run on a vVol as it is then dependent on itself. Similarly, the VASA VM is dependent on vCenter, so both should be kept on a standard VMFS or NFS volume. If you have vCenter on a vVol, and both VASA VM and vCenter go down you are SOL.

"You should not run VASA Provider on a VVOL datastore. Any management operation, including powering on a virtual machine that is on a VVOL, requires that VASA Provider be running. In addition, you would lose access to all VVOLs because VASA Provider would not be able to boot."
