- C. Option A
- D. Option B

Answer: B

Explanation:

Network Access Protection (NAP) is a new set of operating system components included with the Windows [\[email#160;protected\]](#) 2008 and Windows [\[email#160;protected\]](#) operating systems that provides a platform to help ensure that client computers on a private network meet administrator-defined requirements for system health. NAP policies define the required configuration and update status for a client computer's operating system and critical software. For example, computers might be required to have antivirus software with the latest signatures installed, current operating system updates installed, and a host-based firewall enabled. By enforcing compliance with health requirements, NAP can help network administrators mitigate some of the risk caused by improperly configured client computers that might be exposed to viruses and other malicious software.
