NEW QUESTION: 1
Which of the following combinations represent a true multi-factor authentication mechanism?
A. password and PIN
B. password and retina scan
C. password and token
D. token and fingerprint
E. fingerprint and retina scan
F. PIN and token
Answer: B,C,D,F
Explanation:
Multi-factor authentication is the requirement of more than one form of proof of identity, from more than one type (factor) of proof. The three main types of factors are:
*Human Factors (something you are), which includes biometrics such as retina scans, fingerprints, etc.

*Personal Factors (something you know), such as passwords, PINs, etc.
*Technical Factors (something you have), for instance smart card, token, etc.
A multi-factor authentication scheme must include at least one form of proof from at least two of the above factor types. For instance, it could include the use of a smart card and PIN, but not a password and PIN.
Note: Multi-factor authentication greatly reduces the risk of establishing fraudulent identity over a scheme that uses only one factor. It takes away the ability to fraudulently authenticate by obtaining any single piece of technology or password secret. One way to achieve multi-factor authentication without requiring additional proofs from the user is to track which devices the user logs in from. The device can suffice as something the user has, for instance a laptop computer. If the user logs in from a different device, or the device is used for a different user, then additional authentication challenges may be warranted.
