In the course of responding to an information security incident, the BEST way to treat evidence for possible legal action is defined by:

- A. generally accepted best practices.
- B. local regulations.
- C. international standards.
- D. organizational security policies.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Explanation

Legal follow-up will most likely be performed locally where the incident took place; therefore, it is critical that the procedure of treating evidence is in compliance with local regulations. In certain countries, there are strict regulations on what information can be collected. When evidence collected is not in compliance with local regulations, it may not be admissible in court. There are no common regulations to treat computer evidence that are accepted internationally. Generally accepted best practices such as a common chain-of-custody concept may have different implementation in different countries, and thus may not be a good assurance that evidence will be admissible. Local regulations always take precedence over organizational security policies.
